PROJECT TITLE

The Concept of Rhythm in the Arts ca. 1900 and Its Temporal and Cultural Implications

PROJECT DESCRIPTION

This project deals with the concept of rhythm in aesthetics, literature, and the visual arts around 1900. During this period, and with striking frequency, philosophers and artists referred to a notion of rhythm in order to emphasize the physical origin of aesthetic experience—in contrast to an intellectual understanding of art. Taking up this debate on rhythms and, contrary to historical approaches to aesthetics, my research attempts to unfold the latent temporal dimension of art and its experience, including cultural and non-Western concepts of time and temporality. The project also investigates the question of why the established concept of rhythm could not prevail after 1900 and whether the idea of rhythmical experience can inform current debates, e.g., discussions about “presence” in the humanities or more specific investigations into reception aesthetics.
